Curiosities of Animal Life, From the correspondence of Nature we take the following:

the following:

"About twenty years ago I was residing on the coast of County Antrim, Iroland, at the time the telegraph wires wore set up along that charming road which skirts the sea for tyenty-five miles between Larne and Cushendal. During the winter months large flocks of starlings always migrated over from Scotland, arriving in the carly morning. The first winter after the wires were stretched along the coast I frequently found numbers of starlings lying dead or wounded on the roadside, they having evidently in their flight in the dusky morn struck against the telegraph wires—not blown against them, as these accidents often occurred when there was but little wind. I found that the peasantry had come to the conclusion that these unusual deaths were due to the flash of the telegraph messages, killing any starlings that happened to be proceed on the wires when working deaths were due to the flash of the telegraph messages, killing any starlings that happened to be perched on the wires when working.

1 00 Strange to say that throughout the following and succeeding winters hardly a death occurred among the starlings on their arrival.

1 twould thus appear that the birds were deeply impressed and understood the cause of the fatal accidents among their fellow-travelers that previous year, and hence carefully avoided the telegraph wires; not only so, but the young birds must also have acquired this knowledge and perpetuated it—a knowledge which they could not have acquired by experience or even instinct, unless the instinct was really inherited memory derived from the parents whose brains were first impressed parents whose brains were first impressed

'A plague of rats visited the higher coffee districts of Ceylon during the year 1875, doing great damage to young and old plantations alike. It is remarkable that the invasion of rate was simultaneous with the flowering and death of the Nillos (Strobilanthes), which forms the greater part of the underwood of Ceylon forest, and is said to flower and die once every sown years. seven years. The most remarkable part of the plague was that the rats did not seem to deplague was that the rats did not seem to de-your any part of the branches they cut off, but to nip off and leave them untouched upon the ground. So serious, indeed, was the damage done that on some coffee estates rewards were given to coolies for every rat they caught, and it was not an uncommon thing to hear of three or four hundred rats being destroyed, on one estate only, per week."

or four hundred rats being destroyed, on one estate only, per week."

"About three o'clock on the 11th of June I picked up a female butterfly, the head of which had recently been plucked off by a bird and was lying near the body. Thinking it was dead, I carried it home to examine the wing scales. On chipping off a bit of wing about four hours afterward, the legs moved, and in a short time an egg was laid. Others followed, till five-and-twenty had been expelled. The laying then ceased, and the headless The laying then ceased, and the headless mother seemed dead. Nextmorning, on touching her, the laying was resumed. On close examination a heaving of the wings and rings of the abdomen could be observed with about the frequency of human breathing. At the end of twenty-nine and a half hours from the time of finding the laying ceased. Seventy-eight eggs were laid by the butterfly with her head off.

A Maori Dance. [New Zealand Letter in Philadelphia Ledger.]

In the evening the natives treated us to a baka, or dance, in honor of the Governor. It took place in the carved house I have already spoken of, the weird, grotesque carvings of which added to the strangeness of the scene. There were about a hundred dancers ranged in five rows, the front one consisting of about twenty young women, gorgeously apparalled in tight-fitting red and white calleo bodices and flaming-colored rugs, worn like kilts. When the Governor entered they greeted him with the Governor entered they greeted him with the most awful noise, shouting, yelling, laughing and in some diabolical way imitating the noise of the beating of tin-cans, the barking of dogs and rapid hand-clapping. The dauce lasted about an hour. It was curious, and as a novelty amusing, but rather monotonous. There was but little movement of their feet. It consisted chiefly of swaying their bodies and arms about, going down on their knoes, imitating rowing and gathering crops, slapping their own legs and then their neighbors'. The men then took the place of the women and went through very similar performances. The whole dance was accompanied formances. The whole dance was accompanied by noise that would have put pandemonium to shame. It sounded like a mixture of beating of trays, dogs fighting, gigantic snoreing, and a very full deep bass rumbling in the threat. At times there seemed to be a kind of rythine song, interspersed with yells and short, share cries of "Hae, hue!" "Ha, ha!" "Pakeka!" The young women winked and grinned and twisted about beyond what was strictly correct; but they seemed to enjoy the really hard work of the dance most thoroughly. There was always a chief running up and formances. The whole dance was accompanied ly. There was always a chief running up and down, dancing and declaiming in the foreground, bidding defiance to all the world apparently, but in reality I believe, merely, suggesting that he would like to drink His Excellency's health. Far the most comical feature of the dance was a naked little imp who stood in front of the first row, exactly opposite the Governor, and imitated playing the fiddle with his little thin arms, all the while thrusting out his tongue, rolling his eyes nearly out of his head and making the most fearful faces and contortions. A little girl who tried to de the same had not nearly the same real genius for making herself hideous and grotesque. At last a liberal supply of beer was promised them, the dance came to an oud and the Governor departed, and an upwar if There was always a chief running up and and the Governor departed, amid an upwar if possible more awful than before.

The eye could just see a dark spot in the basket; then there was a sudden jar, and a cry was heard that the trap would fly out. On a sudden impulse the besit was fluing off, the brake put on and the machine stopped. Was "gray-beard" dead? Not a bit. He was streaking it fore-and-aft the trap, his lively syes as bright as ever. The "old general" seemed to have an impression that affairs were nearing a climax, for a desputring squeal was heard as the basket again started up. Then the belt was thrown off and the break applied. THE WAS OF INCREATING SUCCESS.
